

The inclusion imperative for boards

Redefining board responsibilities to support organizational inclusion

About the Deloitte Diversity & Inclusion Client Service Center of Excellence

Deloitte LLP's Diversity and Inclusion (D&I) consulting practice serves clients through cutting-edge marketplace solutions that engage diverse talent; build inclusive leaders; and foster innovative, courageous, and equitable cultures. Our work in D&I strategy, bias mitigation, and inclusive leadership engages board- and C-suite-level executives in strengthening inclusive cultures and diverse workplaces in pursuit of business outcomes. Read more about Deloitte's D&I services on Deloitte.com.

Contents

Yes, boards do matter for inclusion		2
Why should boards care about inclusion?		3
Influencing inclusion: The board's responsibilities in five key areas		5
What can boards do now?		13
Appendix		14
Endnotes		15

Yes, boards do matter for inclusion

CORPORATE AND NONPROFIT boards of directors—spurred by a mix of persuasive research; pressure from shareholders, employees, customers and business partners; and their own intuitive sense of what’s right—have been working for years to improve diversity in their own ranks. For example, the percentage of women on Fortune 500 boards rose to 22.5 percent in 2018, up from 15.7 percent at the start of this decade. People of color on Fortune 500 boards increased from 12.8 percent in 2010 to 16.1 percent in 2018.¹

There’s little debate that driving diversity should continue to be an important priority for all organizational leaders; nevertheless, it is becoming increasingly evident that focusing on diversity without also focusing on inclusion is not a winning strategy.² Management teams—their efforts often led by chief diversity, inclusion, or human resources officers—have started to recognize this, and some have taken concrete action to develop and execute inclusion strategies that go beyond diversity to create inclusive cultures at their organizations.

Inclusion, however, is an issue whose importance touches leaders beyond the C-suite. So, what can boards do to further promote and solidify an inclusive culture at the organizations they oversee? A great deal, it turns out. Although boards of directors remain one step removed from the C-suite’s execution focus, they have a meaningful role to play in building an inclusive enterprise, and they can govern in ways that put C-suites and organizations on a positive path.

DEFINING DIVERSITY AND INCLUSION

While diversity and inclusion may be inextricably linked, they are not one and the same.

- Diversity refers to the presence of people who, as a group, have a wide range of characteristics, seen and unseen, which they were born or have acquired. These characteristics may include their gender identity, race or ethnicity, military or veteran status, LGBTQ+ status, disability status, and more.
- Inclusion refers to the practice of making all members of an organization feel welcomed and giving them equal opportunity to connect, belong, and grow—to contribute to the organization, advance their skill sets and careers, and feel comfortable and confident being their authentic selves.

The main difference between the two is that diversity is a state of being and is not itself something that is “governed,” while inclusion is a set of behaviors and can be “governed.”

Therefore, this report emphasizes the board’s role in governing inclusion. This by no means diminishes the importance of diversity and the need to continue to drive progress. On the contrary, boards should engage in conversations with management about improving diversity, and this in itself is an inclusive practice.

Why should boards care about inclusion?

“THE BOARD SETTING an example is important,” states a director of a Fortune 500 industrial products manufacturer. “If the board is not both diverse and inclusive, it lacks credibility with management”—as likely as well with investors, customers, employees, and other stakeholders.

Yet boardroom conversation around the board’s influence over inclusion is often scarce. A review of some charters for board committees in areas with potential diversity and inclusion implications—such as nominating and governance, human resources, and compensation—revealed that while more than half mentioned diversity and inclusion, these references most often only pertained to demographic composition (diversity). A small minority of these charters made direct references to the board’s oversight of inclusive organizational culture, practices, or strategy (inclusion).³ Additionally, while many boards use tools such as board competency matrices in their succession planning efforts, most of these tools do not provide detailed insight into board members’ experiences and capabilities, including their experience or capability in practicing inclusive behavior.⁴

Qualitative research further reinforces the need for additional board focus on inclusion. Interviews with board members and executives of organizations across the marketplace reveal that a large majority of boards may not consider diversity and inclusion as separate concepts. Indeed, most boards’ current efforts in these areas focus mostly on diversity.⁵

Boards have an interest in encouraging inclusion as well as diversity, however. The uplift organizations receive from having an inclusive culture, and not just a diverse workforce, is substantial. Where an inclusive culture exists, employees are much more likely to see themselves as part of a high-performing organization in which teams collaborate and consistently meet client and customer needs. Teams also perform better when they are both diverse and inclusive—there is less groupthink and more innovation.⁶ In fact, the board, as a team, can also exemplify this pattern. When comparing low- and high-performing boards, high-performing boards are more likely to exhibit gender balance and inclusive behaviors.⁷

These outcomes of inclusion can translate into financial results. When operating under an inclusive culture and inclusive talent practices, organizations generate up to 30 percent higher revenue per employee, are more profitable than their competitors,⁸ and become eight times more likely to achieve positive business outcomes.⁹

In short, because diversity alone does not ensure that organizations are able to bring a wide variety of insights, life experiences, and perspectives to bear on their challenges and opportunities, boards should also value and promote inclusion as a separate yet connected priority.

It is time for boards to recognize both their potential for influencing inclusion and their responsibility to do so, not only for the sake of their own organizations and employees but, where relevant, also for the sake of their various stakeholders. “Shareholders ask about diversity and inclusion because they know [diversity and inclusion] add to long-term shareholder value,” says Kosta Kartsois, chairman and CEO, Fossil Group. Furthermore, as markets and customer preferences shift, boards and executives benefit from recognizing that prioritizing the inclusion of diverse customers and stakeholders is key to staying competitive in the marketplace.¹⁰

How can boards shift into an inclusion governance mindset? While it may seem an amorphous undertaking, it is possible for boards to chart a clear way forward that embeds inclusion into every facet of the organization’s work, workforce, and workplace.

Influencing inclusion: The board's responsibilities in five key areas

"It all starts at the board to set the tone for inclusion as a priority both internally and externally."

— Ken Denman, governance & nominating committee chair, Motorola Solutions

Past research reveals, and our interviews confirm, that boards of directors traditionally own five key areas of organizational oversight:¹¹

- Strategy
- Governance
- Talent
- Integrity
- Performance

As these responsibilities evolve to account for changes in regulations, the business environment, and society in general, the role boards play in influencing inclusion within each of these five areas is becoming even more important.

Strategy

"Boards don't run the company—they govern. Boards can ask questions about the culture, whether or not it's inclusive, and how to support an inclusive culture with the business strategy. That's the board's job."

— Director, various Fortune 500 organizations

In the most inclusive organizations, inclusion is seen by all employees as critical to business strategy.¹² However, building an inclusive culture does not happen overnight. Boards can expedite progress by helping management define a common vision for what inclusion means and embed that vision directly into the business strategy.

In defining the vision for inclusion, the board and management will want to consider how individual, organizational, and societal biases may interfere with reaching inclusion goals. For example, if individuals with different identities are hired or promoted, or leave the organization, at unequal rates, what could this indicate about the level of inclusion employees might experience at the organization? If community partners and vendors do not have inclusive policies within their own firms and operations, what signals might a partnership or contractual relationship send to employees and the marketplace? If products and services are not designed to meet the needs of a diverse set of customers, how might this affect the company's bottom line?

Additionally, the definition of inclusion should tie into the organization's objectives, vision, mission, and strategy, perhaps using language directly from the organization's mission statement. The tighter the alignment, the more deeply the inclusion message will resonate with board members, executives, and the broader workforce, and the more likely it will be to elicit behavior changes that contribute to a more inclusive culture.

FIGURE 1

How boards can ingrain inclusion into their organizational strategy

What should boards ask?	What should boards do?
What is the organization's active working definition of "inclusion," and what is its vision for an inclusive culture?	Align with management on the definition of "inclusion." Validate management's inclusion vision, strategies, and goals. Proactively provide input to shape or enhance the inclusion vision, strategies, and goals when relevant or necessary.
How does the business strategy reflect inclusion?	Provide input for improvements to the organization's business strategies to best align with the organization's inclusion vision, strategies, and goals, as needed.
What is the organization doing to advance its inclusion agenda, and where is it making progress?	Seek to understand the organization's high-level diversity and inclusion maturity levels and efforts. Request information from management to inform the board's guidance for addressing the organization's significant gaps.
What are the existing enablers (such as business resource groups) and barriers (such as unconscious bias) to creating an inclusive culture? How can the enablers be promoted and the barriers broken down?	Stay aware of the organization's inclusion enablers and barriers (which may also likely impact the organization's diversity). Evaluate and approve major solutions toward promoting enablers and breaking down barriers as recommended by management.

Source: Deloitte analysis.

Governance

"To truly embody and govern inclusion, the board should reflect the diversity of [the organization's] customer base in its composition, create an inclusive culture within the boardroom itself, and integrate inclusive thinking and behaviors into all of the ways that the board operates."

— Trudy Bourgeois, founder and CEO, Center for Workforce Excellence

It is incumbent upon boards to govern and operate with an inclusion lens—particularly as they preside over shifts in strategy, advise on major investments, and monitor risks. Boards that demonstrate inclusive governance practices integrate inclusive thinking in all board proceedings and understand how their actions and decisions may lead to inclusion-related implications. Consider these potential boardroom scenarios:

- As an example of how board members interact, when having heated discussions or discussing sensitive topics in board meetings, are all board members able to contribute equally and do they feel welcome to do so? If not, how can the board operate differently to create an open and authentic environment for all of its members?
- As an example of governing business strategy, when the board is helping to evaluate whether to acquire another organization, does the board consider how the target's level of inclusion—informed in part by the diversity of its workforce—compares to the organization's

FIGURE 2

How boards can embed inclusion into the way that they govern

What should boards ask?	What should boards do?
How are decisions made by the board? If relevant, how is inclusion, and not just diversity, explicitly factored into those decisions?	Consider both diversity and inclusion implications when making decisions, even those in areas that are not traditionally associated with diversity and inclusion. Ensure that all board members involved in the decision-making process are heard and respected.
Do board committee charters lay the foundation for inclusive behaviors in all relevant board processes?	Embed inclusive language, thinking, and actions into all relevant proceedings and practices.
If inclusion is not already practiced, how can the board best begin to foster inclusion through its operating principles and behaviors?	Conduct a self-assessment of inclusion governance practices and develop a plan to embed inclusion into all board processes. Consider forming an inclusion-specific committee or designating an inclusion champion within the board as a starting point.
Does the data informing the board's operations and decision-making come from a diverse and inclusive set of sources and perspectives?	Avoid confirmation bias by challenging management to seek out accurate information and research from multiple, diverse sources and perspectives.

Source: Deloitte analysis.

own? If the target is not as advanced in these areas, what risks could the organization thereby assume, and how can they be mitigated?

Similarly, inclusive board committees consider inclusion as a key element when crafting and executing their separate charters, perhaps going so far as to explicitly detail expectations for operating in an inclusive manner.

As a first step in holding itself accountable for inclusive governance practices, boards may even consider establishing a committee, temporary or permanent, focused specifically on inclusion. This inclusion committee's mandate would be to elevate inclusion's visibility in the boardroom and promote inclusive governance practices across all board committees and procedures.

Talent

"Where the board can influence inclusion is in asking questions like, 'What is [management] doing to ensure that people at all levels and of all backgrounds have an opportunity to be developed and mentored into the senior management levels?'"

— General Lester Lyles (USAF retired), Chairman, USAA and director, General Dynamics and NASA

It is often said: Tone starts at the top. Boards can best advance the inclusion agenda not just by embodying inclusive leadership traits among their own members, but also by holding management accountable for developing the organization's talent—executives, managers, and front-line employees—into inclusive leaders.

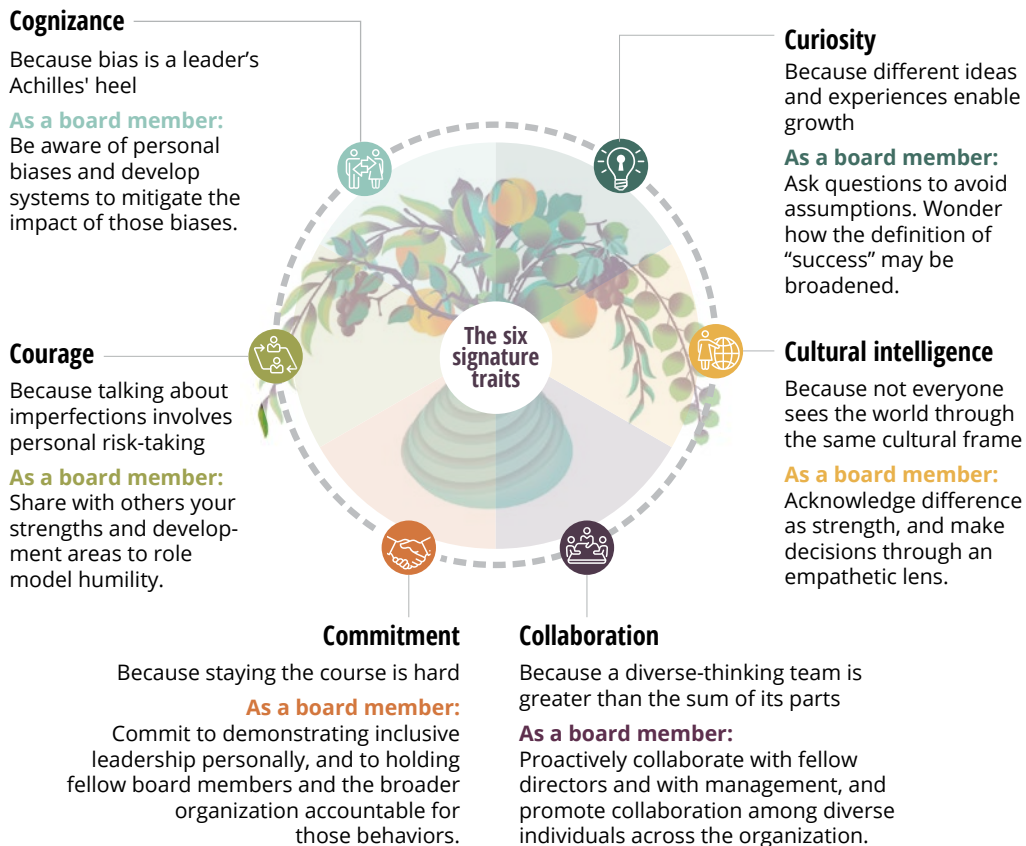

In general, inclusive leaders recognize and value people and groups based on their unique characteristics and learn to mitigate biases stemming from stereotypes. They also leverage the thinking of diverse groups of individuals for smarter ideation and decision-making, reducing the odds of being blindsided by up to 30 percent, increasing innovation by up to 20 percent, and fostering a sense of trust.¹³

Deloitte has identified six signature traits of inclusive leadership: commitment, courage, cognizance, curiosity, cultural intelligence, and collaboration (figure 3).¹⁴ Board members can use these traits as a starting point for modeling inclusive leadership in all of their daily interactions and behaviors, both inside and outside of the boardroom.

To promote a pipeline of inclusive leaders, boards can encourage management to set these same six traits as formal competencies for senior leaders by embedding them into the organization’s performance management, professional development, and succession planning processes. “Organizations would rarely promote business leaders who don’t demonstrate a level of financial knowledge, and this same thought process should be applied for demonstration of inclusive behaviors,” says Trudy Bourgeois, founder and CEO of the Center for Workforce Excellence. “Inclusion is, in fact, a business imperative. So, if you are being considered for a top leadership position, then you should have already demonstrated competency as an inclusive leader.”

FIGURE 3

Inclusive leadership for board members

Sources: Juliet Bourke and Bernadette Dillon, The six signature traits of inclusive leadership: Thriving in a diverse new world, Deloitte Insights, April 14, 2016; Deloitte analysis.

FIGURE 4

How boards can help foster inclusive talent

What should boards ask?	What should boards do?
How are inclusive leadership traits and characteristics clearly built into the roles of and expectations for senior and executive leaders?	Challenge management to set clear expectations for and to evaluate senior and executive leaders around inclusive leadership. Use similar criteria to evaluate the CEO and board members themselves.
How is inclusion built into the organization's leadership succession plans?	Prioritize an inclusion lens in succession planning (which includes considering the importance of diverse representation). Select inclusive leaders for key positions and encourage management to do the same.
How are inclusion goals built into leadership and workforce development?	Support management in promoting experiences and resources that train leaders and the broader workforce to practice inclusiveness, and help management identify experiential gaps in the leadership ranks that require correction. If needed, suggest development of new positions within the organization specifically focused on accomplishing inclusion goals as they relate to leadership and workforce development.
How are the organization's professionals at all levels, including the board itself, becoming educated on diversity and inclusion and trained on inclusive behaviors?	Influence diversity and inclusion education strategy, including a focus on bias mitigation, and set the tone for the importance of such education by having board members participate in education initiatives.

Source: Deloitte analysis.

Finally, boards have a role in challenging management to cultivate inclusive leadership skills throughout the enterprise. Employees see inclusion as one of the most important factors in deciding where to work, and they want inclusion to be fundamental to their daily work experiences.¹⁵ To achieve this, boards, as well as middle management and other employee groups, also play a critical part in championing and driving inclusive behaviors and practices. Collective accountability from all employees for fostering an inclusive culture is key to a successful and sustainable long-term inclusion strategy.

Integrity

"When boards think and act inclusively, it sends a very clear message [about] what's important to the company."

— Billie Williamson, director, Kraton Corporation, Cushman & Wakefield, and Pentair

By setting the tone for inclusion and prioritizing it both internally and externally, a board has an opportunity to hold itself accountable for maintaining the integrity of its inclusion vision and to improve public perception of the organization and its brand.

FIGURE 5

How boards can frame inclusion as a matter of integrity

What should boards ask?	What should boards do?
What is the organization's inclusion brand externally, and how is it manifested (such as what diverse stakeholders and clients say about their experience with the organization's culture, products, and services)?	Help management strengthen the organization's external inclusion brand, and advise management on any associated risk and areas for improvement.
How do the board, management, and other leaders speak about and embody inclusion, both internally and externally?	Actively embody inclusive leadership behaviors and traits in all personal and professional interactions.
What are employees' perceptions of inclusion?	Understand that employee perception is a critical business driver, and challenge management to implement ongoing measures to effectively assess employee perception of inclusion at the organization.
What could the organization's alliances, clients, or vendors convey about its stance on inclusion?	Understand how key stakeholders within the organization's value chain approach, manage, and promote inclusion, and consider how that aligns with, and may affect, the organization's own commitment to inclusion.

Source: Deloitte analysis.

Board members can advance a commitment to inclusion by leveraging their unique social and political capital to be a champion and role model, while looking for opportunities to directly acknowledge and formally promote their commitment to inclusion: in communications to shareholders, in public appearances, in interviews and conference presentations, and informally in networking and professional conversations.

Elsewhere, the board can guide management to consider how the organization itself talks about or represents inclusion in communications—whitepapers, press releases, marketing materials—and what the organization's people say in the media. Finally, the board can encourage management to consider the integrity of the prospective partner's inclusion vision when entering into alliances with other organizations or contracts with supply chain partners.

Performance

"[Driving] inclusion has to be a shared responsibility, but the roles are different. Management executes and advances the [inclusion] mission, and the board holds management and the organization accountable to that mission."

— Sheila Penrose, chairman, Jones Lang LaSalle Inc. and director, McDonald's Corporation

Transformations of any kind are subject to fatigue and failure unless someone is held accountable for outcomes. Building and maintaining an inclusive culture is no exception, which requires the board to hold the entire organization—management, all employees, and the board itself—accountable.

It is the board's role to monitor diversity and inclusion metrics at a high level, while requesting that management collect and analyze the relevant data (see the sidebar, “Measuring diversity and inclusion”). For instance, roughly 32 percent of respondents to a 2017 human capital survey indicated their organizations do not measure or monitor diversity and inclusion in their recruiting efforts.¹⁶ Boards can play a significant role in closing the gap in this as well as in other areas. With data, the board can not only track the organization’s progress, but also guide its own efforts to operationalize the board’s multifaceted role in embedding inclusive thinking and behavior in strategy, talent, governance, integrity, and performance.

Boards can enhance management’s accountability for progress in inclusion by purposefully rewarding good inclusion performance. While 78 percent of respondents to the aforementioned survey believed inclusion to be a competitive advantage, a mere 6 percent of respondents indicated that their organizations actually tie diversity and inclusion outcomes to performance management

MEASURING DIVERSITY AND INCLUSION

To measure diversity, organizations can track the rate at which they hire and employ people in various demographics, which may be characterized by gender identity, race or ethnicity, military or veteran status, LGBTQ+ status, or disability status, among other traits.

To measure inclusion, which can often be more challenging, organizations can compare the rates of retention, promotion, and attrition among the various demographics used to track diversity. Beyond measuring these factors, organizations should go further to understand the reasons for any differences and whether a lack of an inclusive culture is an underlying cause. Additionally, organizations can field ongoing pulse surveys that ask employees about their perceptions of the work environment, levels of engagement, and overall employee experience.

FIGURE 6

How boards can monitor the organization’s inclusion performance

What should boards ask?	What should boards do?
What metrics are in place to measure the effectiveness of the organization’s inclusion efforts and to identify gaps?	Influence the types of metrics used to track the progress and outcomes of inclusion efforts and the order of priority of these metrics. Prioritize inclusion on the board agenda by regularly scheduling time during board meetings to discuss and monitor diversity and inclusion progress and goals.
How are inclusive behaviors and outcomes rewarded, recognized, and celebrated at the individual and organizational levels? How are noninclusive behaviors and outcomes corrected or mitigated?	Publicly and purposefully celebrate improvements in inclusion, and reward individuals who embody inclusive leadership. Develop corrective actions and plans in concert with management to correct or mitigate noninclusive behaviors.
How is the organization pursuing continuous improvements to enhance its own inclusive practices and outcomes?	Help management identify best-in-class peers to measure the organization’s inclusion maturity against them.

Source: Deloitte analysis.

and compensation.¹⁷ Therefore, at the most senior levels of the organization, boards should consider linking some percentage of performance-based compensation to meeting inclusion objectives. For the rest of the workforce, boards may also encourage management to develop ways to hold all employees accountable for inclusive behaviors. These may include tactics such as developing formal performance expectations or creating monetary incentives, awards, or recognition programs.

Finally, boards should also evaluate their own performance in individually embodying inclusive leadership traits and collectively conducting inclusive governance practices. This evaluation can be incorporated into annual board self-assessments or, if a board decides to form an inclusion-specific board committee, through the inclusion committee members' due diligence.

Where organizational inclusion objectives are not being met, the board can work with management to develop plans for corrective action. Such plans may include deployment of additional awareness and education for areas in need of improvement, or removal of employees who exhibit actions contrary to an inclusive culture.

What can boards do now?

“The endgame is inclusion, and that is how you come up with better results and better solutions for shareholders.”

— Director, Fortune 500 petroleum company

Creating and sustaining an inclusive culture may be one of the most difficult challenges an organization’s leadership, including its board, can undertake. Unlike engineering a better product or rooting out process inefficiencies, it can require teaching people how to rethink or eliminate deeply ingrained and even subconscious perceptions and behaviors. But the potential rewards are too dramatic, the moral imperatives too strong, and the risks of failure too great for boards not to lead on this issue.

The concepts outlined in this report are not intended to serve as a one-size-fits-all solution. Each organization should adapt its inclusion governance approach to reflect its own characteristics: its size and geographic reach; the complexity of its organizational structure; whether it is public, private, or nonprofit; the industry in which it competes; its current levels of diversity and inclusion maturity; and the size and complexity of its board.

Nonetheless, taking steps to cultivate inclusion in the board’s five key areas of responsibility can help lay a path for boards to:

- Articulate the current state of the board’s approach to inclusion governance
- Assess that approach against leading practices
- Identify what can be done to achieve inclusive governance goals
- Implement the changes necessary to accomplish those goals

By setting an example of inclusion in the boardroom, by advocating for an inclusive culture both internally and externally, and by holding management accountable for taking concrete measures to embed a culture of inclusion throughout the enterprise, boards can move a needle that’s been advancing far too slowly for far too long.

AN INCLUSIVE GOVERNANCE STARTER LIST

☑ Strategy

Understand the organization’s current diversity and inclusion environment

☑ Talent

Educate yourself on inclusion and inclusive governance

☑ Governance

Begin embedding inclusion into all board processes

☑ Integrity

With management, concretely define what inclusion means and what behaviors support it

☑ Performance

Begin prioritizing inclusion as a strategic imperative on the board’s agenda, and monitor relevant metrics

Appendix

Research methodology

THE IDEA THAT boards of directors have a role in governing inclusion, or in promoting an inclusive culture within their organizations, has not been widespread across the marketplace. A recent and thorough review of existing governance, diversity, and inclusion literature uncovered no material works on the subject. The topic's novelty was further confirmed by an analysis of board committee charters, which found little to no direct mention of inclusion governance as a board responsibility. Similarly, interviews with current governance, diversity, and inclusion thought leaders uncovered little previous or current work in board governance of inclusion, though most demonstrated support for the concept.

Deloitte Governance Framework

This report outlines five key areas that boards can influence in governing inclusion. The recommendations are shaped both by Deloitte's understanding of the traditional responsibilities of corporate boards and by the insights of seasoned board members and governance leaders. They represent an evolution, through an inclusion lens, of the five key board governance elements, where the responsibility of the board is typically heightened, first introduced in Framing the future of corporate governance: Deloitte Governance Framework.¹⁸ This framework and its elements are largely supported by existing governance literature.

Interviews

As part of the research for this report, the authors interviewed 14 executives and board members, as well as two diversity and inclusion subject matter experts. These interviewees currently sit on the boards of or hold executive management positions at 45 organizations, 19 of which are Fortune 500 companies (data collected via BoardEx).

The interviewees were identified either by Deloitte professionals or by board members at the organizations with which they are or had been associated. All of the interviewees met one or more of the following criteria:

1. The individual currently serves or had served on the board of a Fortune 500 company.
2. The individual is or had been an executive at a Fortune 500 company, where he or she has or had close ties to or knowledge of governance matters.
3. The individual's organization has demonstrated leadership in diversity and inclusion efforts, with accomplishments such as receiving a nomination from the National Association of Corporate Directors NXT initiative annual awards, which recognizes boards of directors that promote greater diversity and inclusion.
4. The individual has demonstrated expertise in the areas of governance, diversity, and inclusion.

The interviews were conducted by phone and were semi-structured. They covered questions that included, but are not limited to, how the interviewees' organizations define diversity and inclusion; how the interviewees saw the role of the board in governing inclusion; and which inclusion governance practices already were in place at their organizations. Two researchers reviewed the transcripts to capture key themes.

Endnotes

1. Deloitte and Alliance for Board Diversity, Missing pieces report: The 2018 board diversity census of women and minorities on Fortune 500 boards, 2019.
2. Laura Sherbin and Ripa Rashid, "Diversity doesn't stick without inclusion," Harvard Business Review, February 1, 2017.
3. See the appendix for a description of the research methodology.
4. Deloitte, 2017 board diversity survey: Seeing is believing, 2017.
5. See the appendix for a description of the interview methodology.
6. Juliet Bourke, Which Two Heads Are Better Than One? How Diverse Teams Create Breakthrough Ideas and Make Smarter Decisions (Sydney: Australian Institute of Company Directors, 2016).
7. Juliet Bourke et al., Toward gender parity: Women on boards initiative, Deloitte, October 2016.
8. Stacia Sherman Garr, Candace Atamanik, and David Mallon, High-impact talent management: The new talent management maturity model, Bersin by Deloitte, 2015.
9. Juliet Bourke and Bernadette Dillon, "The diversity and inclusion revolution: Eight powerful truths," Deloitte Review 22, January 22, 2018.
10. Deloitte and Australian Human Rights Commission, Missing out: The business case for customer diversity, 2017.
11. Deloitte, Framing the future of corporate governance: Deloitte Governance Framework, 2016.
12. Stacia Garr and Candace Atamanik, High-impact diversity and inclusion: Maturity model and top findings, Bersin by Deloitte, 2017.
13. Juliet Bourke and Bernadette Dillon, The six signature traits of inclusive leadership: Thriving in a diverse new world, Deloitte Insights, April 14, 2016.
14. Ibid.
15. Deborah L. DeHaas, Brent Bachus, and Eliza Horn, Unleashing the power of inclusion: Attracting and engaging in the evolving workforce, Deloitte, 2017.
16. Juliet Bourke, Stacia Garr, Ardie van Berkel, and Jungle Wong, Diversity and inclusion: The reality gap, Deloitte University Press, February 28, 2017.
17. Ibid.
18. Deloitte, Framing the future of corporate governance.

About the authors

MIKE FUCCI is chairman of the board, Deloitte. As chairman, Fucci leads the board in providing governance and oversight as well as guidance on priority matters such as firm strategy, brand positioning, risk mitigation, talent development, and leadership succession. For the past 37 years, he has been a practitioner and principal at Deloitte, with specialties in human resource transformation, talent strategies, and total rewards. He is based in Far Hills, New Jersey. Connect with him on LinkedIn at www.linkedin.com/in/fuccimike/ and Twitter @fucci_mike.

TERRI COOPER is currently the US national chief inclusion officer for Deloitte. Cooper has a personal passion and commitment to growing and developing talent at all levels. As chief inclusion officer, Cooper drives Deloitte's strategy to recruit, develop, and advance a diverse workforce and foster an inclusive environment. She is focused on advancing inclusive leadership at all levels to advance inclusion in workplaces today. She is based in New York. Connect with her on LinkedIn at www.linkedin.com/in/drterricooper and Twitter @DrTerriCooper.

Acknowledgments

The authors would like to thank the 2018 Deloitte Board Council—a membership of nonboard Deloitte partners and principals assisting with the governance process at Deloitte—for their passion and leadership in driving the development of this piece: Ellen Basilico, Christina Bieniek, Kristen Cove, Mohana Dissanayake, Nnamdi Lowrie, Prateep Menon, Emily Mossburg, Kavitha Prabhakar, Jon Raphael, Michael Rohrig, Thomas Rudegeair, and Michael Stephan.

Thank you to Mark Steiger, vice chairman of the Deloitte US board of directors, and Sam Balaji, Global Risk and Advisory leader and member of the Deloitte US board of directors, for their unwavering support in advising the Board Council.

Last but not least, thank you also to Devon Dickau and Shanna Traphoner-Liu for their deep expertise in diversity and inclusion and tireless contributions to shape the research and writing of this piece.

About the Deloitte Center for Board Effectiveness

Deloitte's Center for Board Effectiveness helps directors fulfill their oversight responsibility to the organizations they serve throughout their board service through a portfolio of high-quality, innovative experiences throughout their tenure as board members. Whether an individual is aspiring to board participation or has extensive board experience, the center's programs can enable them to contribute effectively and provide focus in the areas of governance and audit, strategy, risk, innovation, compensation, and succession.

Contacts

Deborah DeHaas

Vice chairman
National managing partner
Center for Board Effectiveness
Deloitte
+1 312 560 9827
ddehaas@deloitte.com

Devon Dickau

Deputy lead
Manager
Diversity & Inclusion Client Service
Center of Excellence
Deloitte Consulting LLP
+1 323 793 4225
ddickau@deloitte.com

Deloitte.

Insights

Sign up for Deloitte Insights updates at www.deloitte.com/insights.

 Follow @DeloitteInsight

Deloitte Insights contributors

Editorial: Junko Kajji, Abrar Khan, and Preetha Devan

Creative: Emily Moreano

Promotion: Ankana Chakraborty

Cover artwork: Neil Webb

About Deloitte Insights

Deloitte Insights publishes original articles, reports and periodicals that provide insights for businesses, the public sector and NGOs. Our goal is to draw upon research and experience from throughout our professional services organization, and that of coauthors in academia and business, to advance the conversation on a broad spectrum of topics of interest to executives and government leaders.

Deloitte Insights is an imprint of Deloitte Development LLC.

About this publication

This publication contains general information only, and none of Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu Limited, its member firms, or its and their affiliates are, by means of this publication, rendering accounting, business, financial, investment, legal, tax, or other professional advice or services. This publication is not a substitute for such professional advice or services, nor should it be used as a basis for any decision or action that may affect your finances or your business. Before making any decision or taking any action that may affect your finances or your business, you should consult a qualified professional adviser.

None of Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu Limited, its member firms, or its and their respective affiliates shall be responsible for any loss whatsoever sustained by any person who relies on this publication.

About Deloitte

Deloitte refers to one or more of Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu Limited, a UK private company limited by guarantee ("DTTL"), its network of member firms, and their related entities. DTTL and each of its member firms are legally separate and independent entities. DTTL (also referred to as "Deloitte Global") does not provide services to clients. In the United States, Deloitte refers to one or more of the US member firms of DTTL, their related entities that operate using the "Deloitte" name in the United States and their respective affiliates. Certain services may not be available to attest clients under the rules and regulations of public accounting. Please see www.deloitte.com/about to learn more about our global network of member firms.